I was lucky but mostly unlucky in my childhood. I am lucky to not endure high pressure and chase my young dreams freely without “restrictions”, thought I could be the happiest all with myself, and imagined if this can keep on forever, but my younger self did not realize the reason behind this illusion. Less caring from parents? No friends to talk with? These are the top reasons that I could come up with sitting here and recalling my childhood.

I never imagine I will be where I am now because from my stereotypical impressions when it comes to the word “business”, it's people in formal suits and chatting all day but I am not that kind of person. According to my brother, I am “socially depressed”. To be honest I often doubt if is this the right path for me even though it is probably too late. This is indeed not the first time I doubt my decisions, questioning if I should go on and losing my dream of me choosing another path. Similarly, I wouldn't ever imagine I am in London, the place I dislike, mainly because I failed to fit into it. Seeing others enjoying the city and having their good life I envy but also quite sad “why I do not enjoy it like them” or “why I do not have the courage and motivation to be like them?” I often wonder, meanwhile I just stay alone and keep everything to myself.

Before going to university, I ask myself will I stay the same. Realizing I cannot continue this anymore, I am eager to change, and step out of my comfort zone. Here I am in Bayes Business School, which changed me, I am having a feeling that I never had before, have more confidence in myself and slowly transforming into the kind of person I wished I become. This is destined to be unique for my life.

London became different in my view although still trying to fit in, it is a city with many opportunities and possibilities. It's a gold mine to what am I studying and likely to start my career on. Now I realized that people are always learning new things that could change their thoughts and perception, just as the school's motto, "always curious, always bold and always learning".

Now I started to imagine where will I be after I graduated as I click out my past and present stories in front of my computer. It seems like a loop in my internal mind, could it be somewhere I could never think of? All I can say now these awaiting decisions will lead me to an unknown future, but these all together eventually fabricate my unique story. Therefore, everything is uncertain, but everything is possible.
